Balancing work and family

Like so many of the challenges and dilemmas of marriage, balancing family and work has no easy solution, no one-size-fits-all approach. Every person and couple will have their own preferences and needs.

Many couples tell us that they have seen the drawbacks of their parents attempting to 'do it all' and ending up very much over-extended. Still others hope to avoid the restrictions of roles and experiences that are too narrow or mismatched for them. Couples are struggling with the relative priorities of their values, family involvement, career and material goals, personal growth and fulfillment.

The most important thing we can tell you about balance: preparation, intentionality and joint decision-making are the key to creating and maintaining the right family-work balance for you. Many couples experience extremely strong forces pulling them away from the priority that they would like their family to have. If you don't aggressively plan your balance, these other forces will prevail. Without a clear plan and commitment to maintaining balance, time and energy for family erodes and evaporates.

Family-work balance is a process, not a static achievement. The real task of balance takes place on a weekly and daily basis, even from hour to hour. This is where couples hold the line to protect family time or allow it to evaporate where they opt to take advantage of a family opportunity or allow other priorities to interfere.
