Exotic Pets

A pet is an animal that lives with you like a kind of friend. A pet is an animal that you keep just because you like it. It is not a working animal, and it's not for food. The exotic part can mean three things, the pet is rare, unusual, or comes from far away. Since exotic pets can come from far away, they often need special places to live. For example, tortoises need warm places. These special pets can also need special food. Sometimes the food a pet needs costs a lot of money.

Many countries have rules regarding keeping exotic pets. It is usually due to the possible danger to others should the pet escape. In Japan, you will find these animals in pet stores; meerkats, squirrels, armadillos, bats, mini pigs and even raccoons to name a few. Unfortunately, because people in Japan are often transferred from one place to the next, people end up just releasing their pet into the open. So now people are finding crocodiles and piranhas in the rivers. Both species are not native to Japan.

There needs to be better rules and regulations regarding keeping exotic pets or even to have a special location that can take on unwanted pets. It is a danger to society to have these animals running around.
